Transitions in North America

William P. Fullagar

The movements of the "Temple" secret societies across North America to which you will read here are protected by a second layer of citizenship that is limited to the description of the "Temple". In 1980, the "Temple" society of Chicago was founded by a group of students from the University of California at Berkeley, who believed that the "Temple" society was part of a worldwide network of secret societies that controlled world events. The "Temple" society has been described as a "modern-day Illuminati" and has been linked to a number of other secret societies, including the "Santo Spirito" and the "Rosicrucian Order".

The "Temple" society claims to have a long history, originating in ancient times and having connections to various secret societies and traditions. The "Temple" society has been linked to a number of scandals and controversies, including allegations of financial fraud and corruption. The "Temple" society has also been criticized for its links to right-wing political groups and its role in influencing public opinion.

The "Temple" society has a complex and controversial history, and its true nature remains unknown. However, the society continues to attract attention and controversy, and its activities remain a subject of speculation and debate.
