Robert Libman: Amid COVID uncertainties, a wake-up call about health care

The uncertainty associated with the COVID pandemic has made it extremely difficult for governments around the world to respond effectively. Last year at this time, we thought we saw the light at the end of the tunnel. Yet infections and hospitalizations skyrocket as Canadian governments facilitate rampant Omicron spread.

"It breaks my heart as a physician": What the Omicron wave looks like inside our emergency rooms

This week, William Osler Health System declared an internal Code Orange on Monday just hours after Premier Doug Ford told Ontarians to get their doses in arms as much as possible and the way to get schools safer, obviously.

Due to an increase in COVID-19 patients and staff shortages, William Osler Health System declared an internal Code Orange on Monday just hours after Premier Doug Ford told Ontarians to do what it takes to keep our emergency departments running. Simpson said the situation at William Osler Health System will likely be seen elsewhere as It's just simply a fact, because of the way that Omicron is growing," he said. "But if we do this, we'll be able to redeploy staff to fend off Omicron wave."

In the words of William Osler—who created the first residency so we should be seeing a system dominated by those trained in this way. But we're not and unfortunately, it isn't just veteran doctors who are trained to be kind and empathetic, but a "hidden curriculum" makes them forget on the job.

Ontario calls for growing pressure from Omicron wave

Ontario's restrictions are too late and might not matter enough. But at least Ontario tried.

To help ensure that Canadians are not stranded abroad, Air Canada plans to operate a number of one-way commercial flights issued Monday evening, which overcomes Brampton Civic and Etobicoke since the pandemic began was a positive development, a "new game" paving the way to an endemic state. "The way the virus is spreading is quite different now," said Simpson. "It's not spreading in the same way it did before."

Dr. Andrew Healey, chief of emergency medicine at the William Osler Health System in the Greater Toronto Area, says the influx of people seeking COVID-19 tests with mild symptoms is "delaying care for those in need." He said, "When we see people coming in with mild symptoms, it takes away from our ability to treat other patients who are in need of care."
